

Paul McKey : Profile

Managing Director and Senior Consultant
Redbean Learning Solutions

→ Paul McKey is an internationally recognised authority in the area of online learning. Paul is Redbean's founder and senior consultant; he is an experienced senior consultant capable of leading and innovating at all levels of the organisation and specialises in change management strategies for the integration of new technology and online learning programs.

Paul has consulted and practiced extensively in the Information Technology and Education sectors in Australasia and the USA, primarily in the areas of organisational learning and development, online learning programs, online systems design and business improvement. He has designed and managed learning programs on global networks since the early nineties.

Paul has a background in film and music, formal qualifications in Electronics Engineering (Data Communications) and a Master of Education degree from Southern Cross University. He has complemented his unique understanding of the relationship of business, technology and education with further development in Knowledge Management, Business Analysis and Organisational Change and is thus able to better support organisations either utilising and integrating information technologies or embracing new business and eLearning opportunities.

Paul also offers coaching for individuals or small teams in the Learning and Development (L&D) sphere. This coaching can specifically assist with your online learning program design and development. He has advised and helped many executives, managers and practitioners to achieve successful L&D outcomes which both enhanced them as individuals and their organisations.

Paul writes, speaks and consults extensively on learning and development related issues in business and education. ☒
